The Cultured Man as the Noble Man:
Jun zi 君子 as a Man of Li 禮
in Lun yu 論語

Christine Abigail L. Tan

Abstract: The aim of this article is to show the Confucian virtue of li as the highest embodiment of the Jun zi as found in the Lun yu. While ren remains the most primary and most important of the virtues, it is an inner goodness which can only find its expression or manifestation in the virtue of li, while such manifestation is made possible only through an external ontological ideal that is the virtue of yi. As such, the interplay of ren and yi, which finds its harmony in li, is made possible only through the embodiment of li as a dynamic moral principle given substance by ren and given form by li, and perfected by the Jun zi.

Keywords: Jun zi, Li, Confucius, ritual, propriety

L i, or rituals and propriety, when viewed by the modern mind, can have the tendency to be dismissed by modernity as nothing more than empty tradition which binds and limits one’s capabilities, especially in a generation which celebrates the creation of one’s self as an art form. From the Confucian perspective, however, it does just exactly the opposite, which is to widen one’s horizons, that is, consciousness, and thus capabilities as well.

Indeed, one cannot help but wonder just how following ancient, even outdated, traditions can possibly be a virtue. What does this matter of culture, commonly understood as something that’s amoral, have to do with becoming a good citizen of the state, or even becoming a good human being?

1 See Nietzsche’s body of works, among other counter-enlightenment thinkers, which dominate the intellectual trends of contemporary society.

2 That is to say, that high culture as an aesthetic virtue is, after modernity, commonly averse to morality. In a way, culture can even be said to be meta-ethical in that it is the context, which shapes ethics and is therefore not boxed within morality. Nietzsche, Freud, Marx, Foucault, among other thinkers of modernity argue to this effect.
Yet li is considered as one of the five primary Confucian virtues, and as I will try to argue, even the very virtue, which the Noble Man or Jun zi embodies most.

It is thus the aim of this study to show the relation between ren and li, being that li is the manifestation of ren in its concreteness, but which is made possible by the concept of yi. This interplay of ren and yi, which finds its harmony in li is, as I will try to prove, found in the Lun yu to be embodied in the Jun Zi.

In order to do this, I will first show the utmost importance of ren, its immediacy and immanence, as well as show the two aspects of ren, which are zhong and shu. Next, I will show the implication of yi in zhong and shu, coming to the conclusion that yi is an external moral ought while ren is an internal motivation for goodness. The third section will thus deal with the notion of li as the concrete manifestation of the previous two virtues, where the compassion of ren and the unflinching discipline of yi find their perfect harmony. Finally, thus, I will try to show the Jun Zi as a man of li who, in him, and in practicing li to its full effect, is also able to embody ren as well as yi.

I. 仁 Ren

Perhaps there is no other virtue more important than ren. Ren is commonly translated as virtue,3 fundamental goodness,4 true goodness,5 benevolence,6 or idiosyncratically ‘authoritative conduct,’7 which connotes the firm and steadfast nature of how one’s character should be.8

Indeed, ren is regarded as even more important than life itself,9 and

---

3 James Legge and Arthur Waley translate 仁 Ren simply as ‘virtue’ and although this captures the encompassing nature of 仁 Ren (that is, that it necessarily precludes the other virtues, which shall later be discussed), it can be quite problematic in distinguishing it from 有 do, which also directly translates into the word ‘virtue,’ which has a different and less substantive meaning than the concept of 仁 Ren in the Analects. See Confucius, “The Analects,” trans. by James Legge, in Chinese Text Project, <http://ctext.org/analects>, 19 September 2014. See also Confucius, The Analects of Confucius, trans. by Arthur Waley (New York: Vintage Books, 1989).

6 D.C. Lau.

8 Ren is all these but also more, and as such, will be referred to simply as ren.

9 The Master said, “For Gentlemen of purpose and men of benevolence while it is inconceivable that they should seek to stay alive at the expense of benevolence, it may happen that they have to accept death in order to have benevolence accomplished.” See Confucius, *The
“The Master said, ‘If a man sets his heart on benevolence, he will be free from evil.’” In other words ren comes at the helm, serving as a shield from all malevolence that threatens to sully the character of he who possesses the virtue of ren. Furthermore, The Master says, “… The gentleman never deserts benevolence, not even for as long as it takes to eat a meal. If he hurries and stumbles, one may be sure that it is in benevolence that he does so.” In other words, when one has become aware of ren, it can no longer be undone nor erased from one’s character.

The essence of ren, however, is perhaps highlighted through the verse in the Lun yu which reads: “The Master said, ‘It is Man who is capable of broadening the Way. It is not the Way that is capable of broadening Man.’” Such is the humanist foundations of his moral philosophy, which looks at man as the locus of the unity between heaven and earth. This saying of the Master is fleshed out in the rest of the Lun yu, and is mostly seen in the virtue of ren; it is derived from the root words 人 ren meaning person or human, and 二 er meaning two, which suggests that human beings are irreducibly social, and can only exist by co-existing.

a. The Anthropocentricity of ren

If ren has no fixed definition in the Lun yu, it is because ren, as Ames and Rosemont would note, is “a qualitative transformation of a particular

---

10 4:4, D.C. Lau.
11 4:5, D.C. Lau.
12 Literally Dao, though it should be noted that the Confucian Dao is different from the Dao referred to in Laozi and Zhuangzi, as well as the rest of the Daoist school. The Confucian Dao is, unlike the metaphysical Dao of Daoism, anthropologically bent. It is simply an “ought” as opposed to metaphysical principle defining the nature of Being, much less a heavenly canopy which watches over the ten thousand things. In order to elucidate this further, this Dao is what Mencius refers to as Heaven when he describes Tian Ming: “Heaven sees according as my people see; Heaven hears according as my people hear.” See Mencius, The Works of Mencius, trans. by James Legge (New York: Dover Publications, 1990), 18:8. It is also what Xunzi was referring to when he cited the Book of Documents in the chapters “Improving Yourself” and “A Discussion of Heaven,” where he notes that: “The Book of Documents say ‘Do not go by what you like, but follow the way of the king; do not go by what you hate, but follow the king’s road.’ This means that a gentleman must be able to suppress personal desire in favor of public right.” See Xunzi, Basic Writings, trans. by Burton Watson (New York: Columbia University Press, 1963), p. 32; 88.

14 See Roger T. Ames and Henry Rosemont, trans., The Analects of Confucius, 48-51, for a comprehensive discussion on the etymology of 仁 ren as well as its corresponding significance to the philosophical meaning of the concept, which suggests that we are inevitably social and that without another or other human beings, we cannot exist alone.
person,” indeed more like a process of becoming rather than having a fixed formula. Further, in the _Lun yu_, “The Master said, ‘Is benevolence really far away? No sooner do I desire it than it is here,’” because what is internal is that which is most accessible and, for Confucian philosophy in particular, must become evident in _praxis_ and as such, becomes the measurement through which one can know others. Another passage in the _Lun yu_ which goes likes this is, when: “Tzu-hsia said, ‘Learn widely and be steadfast in your purpose, inquire earnestly and reflect on what is at hand, and there is no need for you to look for benevolence elsewhere.’” _Ren_ is thus humaneness that is not simply in theory, but concrete and immanent, even firm and unrelenting.

The anthropological bent can be further seen in more passages in the _Lun yu_, when “The Master said, ‘It is enough that the language one uses gets the point across,’” as the Master did not want to deal with unnecessary hair-splitting, and believed that the only wisdom which mattered was that which is communicable, so it is with _ren_, in that if one is good inside, then it must show one’s deeds; it must be concrete. Moreover, it is said that “the topics the Master did not speak of were prodigies, force, disorder and gods,” for the Master believed that whatever is out there cannot be known by man, for even that which is here, is not yet understood by man, and so deserves more focus.

This said, we see that _ren_, in order to be fully manifest, or to be actualized, must be seen or communicated, and this is done only (as I will later argue how) through the practice of _li_, the importance of which is seen particularly when “The Master said, ‘Guide them by edicts, keep them in line with punishments, and the common people will stay out of trouble but will have no sense of shame. Guide them by virtue, keep them in line with the rites, and they will, besides having a sense of shame, reform themselves.’”

b. Zhong (忠) and Shu (恕)

According to Fung Yu-lan, there are two aspects of _ren_. He notes:

---

15 _Ibid._
16 7:30, D.C. Lau.
17 19:6, D.C. Lau.
18 15:40 D.C. Lau.
19 7:20 D.C. Lau.
20 2:3 D.C. Lau.
21 It is interesting to note, that both ideograms contain the character _xin_ literally translated as heart, but also associated with the mind, and hence more commonly referred to as the mind/heart. As such, it is also interesting to note the relation of _ren_ both to human emotion and reason. See Alfredo P. Co, _The Blooming of a Hundred Flowers: Philosophy of Ancient China_ (Manila: UST Publishing House, 1992), 107-108 for a comprehensive discussion of the etymological significance of the ideograms in relation to _ren_.

© 2015 Christine Abigail L. Tan
ISSN 1908-7330

[CC BY-NC-ND]
Thus the practice of jen consists in consideration for others. “Desiring to sustain oneself, one sustains others; desiring to develop oneself, one develops others.” In other words: “Do to others what you wish yourself.” This is the positive aspect of the practice, which was called by Confucius chung or “conscientiousness to others.” And the negative aspect, which was called by Confucius shu or “altruism,” is: “Do not do to others what you do not wish yourself.” The practice as a whole is called the principle of chung and shu, which is “the way to practice jen.”

Moreover, Yu-lan maintains that this “principle of applying a measuring square” is a principle wherein one uses himself in order to be able to gauge his own conduct.22

Zhong is often translated simply as loyalty and faithfulness. James Legge in particular translates it as faithfulness24 or devotion of soul,25 but a more apt illustration of zhong is found in D.C. Lau’s translation of a verse in the Lun yu where the Master says: “Make it your guiding principle to do your best for others ….”26 This directly supports Yu-lan’s claim that zhong is indeed the positive aspect of ren.

The negative aspect of ren that is shu, on the other hand, is also reflected in the Lun yu when: “Tzu-kung asked, ‘Is there a single word which can be a guide to conduct throughout one’s life?’ The Master said, ‘It is perhaps the word shu.’27 Do not impose on others what you yourself do not desire.’”28

One notices here, that whether it be 忠 zhong or 恕 shu, positive or negative, both are treated as the supreme virtue, because both aspects of 仁 ren, which as we have previously mentioned, consist the most important Confucian virtue. This claim is cemented by one of the oft-cited verses in the Lun yu, that is:

The Master said, ‘Ts’an! There is one single thread binding my way together.’

Tseng Tzu assented.

After the Master had gone out, the disciples asked,
'What did he mean?'
Tseng Tzu said, ‘The way of the Master consists in doing one’s best and in using oneself as a measure to gauge others. That is all.’

「夫子之道，忠恕而已矣。」

That is indeed all, but the phrase “one single thread binding my way together” presupposes a system wherein the philosophy of the Master is built upon, and at its core, according to the verse, is zhong and shu—ren. One should be careful, however, not to interpret this in a literal sense. Rather, 忠 zhong and 恕 shu should be guided by yi.

The sinologist, Alfredo Co, in his book “Philosophy of Ancient China: the Blooming of a Hundred Flowers,” says that yi is implied in zhong through zheng ming or the Rectification of Names.

The Master said, ‘If something has to be put first, it is, perhaps, the rectification (cheng) of names.’
Tzu-lu said, ‘Is that so? What a roundabout way you take! Why bring rectification in at all?’
The Master said, ‘Yu, how boorish you are. Where a gentleman is ignorant, one would expect him not to offer any opinion. When names are not correct, what is said will not sound reasonable; when what is said does not sound reasonable, affairs will not culminate in success; when affairs do not culminate in success, rites and music will not flourish; when rites and music do not flourish, punishments will not fit the crimes; when punishments do not fit the crimes, the common people will not know where to put hand and foot. Thus when the gentleman names something, the name is sure to be usable in speech, and when he says something, this is sure to be practicable. The thing about the gentleman is that he is anything but casual where speech is concerned.’

This again, further supports ren as the very foundation of the Confucian moral system, where zhong that is being true to one’s principle and truth is manifested, and where the firmness of yi is indeed implied.

It is, however, my contention that yi is also implied in shu even if simply on account of shu being a guiding principle towards which we must strive, albeit through restraint—still, moral restraint. What I am trying to arrive at is that yi, righteousness or moral rightness, is an external ideal, which guides our moral actions, made possible by such two aspects of ren.

---

30 Co, Philosophy of Ancient China, 109.

II. Yi

If ren therefore is self-reformation, it takes its form from the moral ought, yi. In the Lun yu, “The Master said, ‘For the gentleman it is morality that is supreme. Possessed of courage but devoid of morality, a gentleman will make trouble while a small man will be a brigand.’”32 Indeed, if ren is the internal motivation for the goodness, yi is the ontological yet external ideal—the universal moral of ren towards which li, as we will later discuss, directs its particular acts. Of the Jun Zī, “The Master said, ‘In his dealings with the world the gentleman is not invariably for or against anything. He is on the side of what is moral.’”33 This, again, affirms the thesis that ren has no fixed definition nor function, but is rather, a process which allows for the practice of li, according to what is yi, in the context of the uniqueness and singularity of each situation and particular circumstance. Moreover, it asserts yi as a constant and universal ideal or righteousness (or more aptly, rightness) upon which li is modeled upon.

In his article “On Yi as a Universal Principle of Specific Application in Confucian Morality,” Chung-ying Cheng claims that yi gives unity to all virtues, and creates more when needed, thus directing what is appropriate for specific situations as an ordering principle which generates specific actions.34 Like ren, Cheng argues that it is a common sentiment to all men rooted from ren, and so whereas ren is internal, yi is external. Yi “transforms the world into a world of self,”35 because it is when the subjective act assumes objective validity. A passage in the Lun yu which affirms this is when “The Master said, ‘It is these things that cause me concern: failure to cultivate virtue, failure to go more deeply into what I have learned, inability, when I am told what is right, to move to where it is, and inability to reform myself when I have defects.’”36 Here, we notice that The Master talks about cultivating ren, which is “deeply” within, while yi or that which is right is mentioned as something “to move to” in order to reform oneself; that is, yi is depicted as something outside of man but towards which he must strive as an ideal of moral perfection, an imperative for moral action, that is (if paired with ren and refined by li) required for a community to prosper, have peace

33 4:10, D.C. Lau.
35 Ibid.
36 7:3, D.C. Lau.
and order, as is thus noted in the Lun yu:

When Fan Ch’ih left, the Master said, ‘How petty Fan Hsu is! When those above love the rites, none of the common people will dare be irreverent; when they love what is right, none of the common people will dare be insubordinate; when they love trust-worthiness, none of the common people will dare be insincere. In this way, the common people from the four quarters will come with their children strapped on their backs. What need is there to talk about growing crops?’

We go back, therefore, to when “The Master said, ‘It is Man who is capable of broadening the Way. It is not the Way that is capable of broadening Man.’” Moreover, “The Master said, ‘The gentleman understands what is moral. The small man understands what is profitable.’” This is because as we have previously mentioned, yi is the capability to connect subjective actions, unique and situational as well as circumstantial deeds into a universal ought which changes flexibly from situation to situation, in the same way that li changes according to the situation. The small man, unable to rise to the universal level of yi, only thinks of himself and, therefore, of personal profit.

This is also why, “the Master said, ‘It is quite a remarkable feat for a group of men who are together all day long merely to indulge themselves in acts of petty cleverness without ever touching on the subject of morality in their conversation!’” Yi elevates the subjective, the particular into the communal, and to be exposed to the community and the normative expectations of society, without ever taking yi into consideration, would indeed be a shame as it would lead to insubordination and chaos.

This elevation from personal to community, or transformation of the world into a “world of self” as previously mentioned, is again found in a passage from the Lun yu, which says:

Tzu-lu commented, ‘Not to enter public life is to ignore one’s duty. Even the proper regulation of old and young cannot be set aside. How, then, can the duty between

---

38 15:29, D.C. Lau.
39 4:16, D.C. Lau; James Legge ‘The Master said, “The mind of the superior man is conversant with righteousness; the mind of the mean man is conversant with gain.”’ (君子喻於義.)
ruler and subject be set aside? This is to cause confusion in the most important of human relationships simply because one desires to keep unsullied one’s character. The gentleman takes office in order to do his duty. As for putting the Way into practice, he knows all along that it is hopeless.①

We can thus conclude that for the Master, ren finds no expression without yi, for it is only through yi where man is brought into a world where others truly exist, and where there can be found an ontological moral given, upon which ren directs itself towards. Indeed, “The Master said, ‘Make it your guiding principle to do your best for others and to be trustworthy in what you say, and move yourself to where rightness is, then you will be exalting virtue.’”② In other words, to move towards yi is to exalt virtue (now in a more general/wider sense): de. Here, moreover, the word used in the Chinese for “exalt” is 崇 chong, which can also mean to worship, to hold high, or to honor—all of which imply a movement of feeling towards a more superior realm. This is because when yi, as was claimed by Chung-ying Cheng, pulls all other virtues into the objective realm.

Yi thus ensures that the moral deed is done, while ren ensures that the motive is aligned. These two make two sides of the same coin. Therefore just as ren manifests itself in li, yi is the form upon which li is expressed. Of the Jun Zi, “The Master said, ‘The gentleman has morality as his basic stuff and by observing the rites puts it into practice, by being modest gives it expression, and by being trustworthy in word brings it to completion. Such is a gentleman indeed!’”③ In other words, the Master Kong says that, the gentleman has yi as his basic stuff, and by observing li, puts it into practice.

This very position of li, where it is the concrete manifestation of the harmony between ren and yi, as well as the Confucian anthropological and practical bent, is precisely what makes li very important despite common misconceptions that li is impractical—abstract rituals that are “out there” and without rational explanations.

III. 禮 Li

In Lin Yutang’s work, “The Wisdom of Confucius,” the following passage on li goes, as follows:

② 12:10, D.C. Lau, Emphasis/Italics mine. (Virtue here is 德 de, not 仁 ren)
③ 15:18, D.C. Lau.
“Is li so very important as all that?” asked Tseyu again. “This li,” replied Confucius, “is the principle by which the ancient kings embodied the laws of heaven and regulated the expressions of human nature. Therefore he who has attained li lives, and he who has lost it dies.”

I would like to emphasize here how li is the harmony of the embodiment of heavenly laws, as well the regulation, the medium, for expression of human nature. This passage from the Book of Rites suggests that the authenticity of a man consists of him in being a man of li which comes with it, both ren and yi.

Li, however, despite referring to sacrificial rites is, in the Confucian sense, largely humanistic and anthropological in nature. If it talks of any such higher order, or heavenly canopy at most, it is only inasmuch as li, although manifested by ren, takes its shape through the ontological moral given, thus universal principle that is yi. To repeat a previously quoted passage for emphasis:

The Master said, ‘The gentleman has morality as his basic stuff and by observing the rites puts it into practice, by being modest gives it expression, and by being trustworthy in word brings it to completion. Such is a gentleman indeed!’

Here, we see the interconnection of ren and yi, practiced into li. More importantly, however, is to establish the connection of ren and li, as we have already established the implied yi in the two aspects of ren.

---

45 Heavenly laws here in no way refer to fa. In fact, it is important to stress the difference between fa or law and li in the Lun Yu. While fa is only mentioned twice, it plays an important role in shaping the multitude. One passage which describes its role is: 「法語之言，能無從乎？改之為貴。…」 The only way to preserve the meaning of which is to provide a rather awkward but very literal translation that goes: “When lawful words are spoken, can one refuse to follow? But to change is most valuable.” See Lun Yu 9.24, translation mine. In other words, it is emphasized here how obeying laws or words spoken in a strict and authoritative manner is easy, but true virtue lies within the inner character. This sentiment also mirrors a passage that can be found in the Li ji, which reinforces the idea that fa is for the xiao ren while it is li that is for the superior man or da ren: “The rules of ceremony do not go down to the common people. The penal statutes do not go up to great officers.” See “Qu Li I,” in The Book of Rites (Li Ji): English-Chinese Version, trans. by James Legge (Washington: Intercultural Press, 2013), par. 68.
46 15:18, D.C. Lau.
In his article “Li as Cultural Grammar: On the Relation between Li and Ren in Confucius’ Lun yu,” Chenyang Li uses the analogy of grammar and language in such a way that li becomes cultural grammar, while ren is the mastery of a culture.47 This claim is sketched against a much controversial debate with regard to the relation between li and ren, as well as several claims on the interpretations of li and ren. My argument, however, follows along the same path as Chenyang Li’s interpretation, where he claims that ren is flexible because ren as mastery is more like an art, whereas li as grammar becomes proper expression, but uses a different analogy. In other words, it’s an instrumentalist claim broadly construed, wherein li and ren complement and need each other in order to function. Moreover, we see in the Lun yu, and even in the Da Xue,48 several analogies of the virtues to a tree. Indeed, ren is the root, but the concrete practice of ren is li. It is said in the Lun yu, that: “The gentleman devotes his efforts to the roots, for once the roots are established, the Way will grow therefrom. Being good as a son and obedient as a young man is, perhaps, the root of a man’s character.”49 Here, we see that ren as practiced becomes li, and through yi, in a web of interconnection and in this particular case, takes on the concrete form of filial piety. This analogy, as well as Chenyang Li’s, is mostly supported by the following passages in the Lun yu:

The Master said, ‘Why is it none of you, my young friends, study the Odes? An apt quotation from the Odes may serve to stimulate the imagination, to show one’s breeding, to smooth over difficulties in a group and to give expression to complaints.50

The Master said, ‘Surely when one says “The rites, the rites,” it is not enough merely to mean presents of jade and silk. Surely when one says “Music, music,” it is not enough merely to mean bells and drums.’51

---

48 In the following verses, it would seem that ren was precluded. “From the Son of Heaven down to the mass of the people, all must consider the cultivation of the person the root of everything besides.”

“It cannot be, when the root is neglected, that what should spring from it will be well ordered.”

See The Great Learning, trans. by James Legge, 13-14. This is not improbable, as The Master himself would say that he is merely a transmitter of ancient wisdom: “The Master said, ‘I transmit but do not innovate; I am truthful in what I say and devoted to antiquity.’” See The Analects, trans. by D.C. Lau, 7:1.

49 1:2 D.C. Lau.

50 17:9 D.C. Lau.

51 17:11 D.C. Lau.
The Master said, ‘A cowardly man who puts on a brave front is, when compared to small men, like the burglar who breaks in or climbs over walls.’

Li cannot exist in of itself, but as it is not simply li, which becomes empty without ren, ren also becomes impossible without li, for even with li, it is difficult. “The Master said, ‘Even with a true king it is bound to take a generation for benevolence to become a reality.’”

As Chenyang Li notes: “Ren cannot exist independently of li, nor can one obtain ren without li, because li is embedded in the culture of which the person of ren acquires mastery. In other words, without li there can be no culture for the person of ren to master.”

This can again be traced back to the Lun Yu, when “The Master said, ‘If a man be without the virtues proper to humanity, what has he to do with the rites of propriety? If a man be without the virtues proper to humanity, what has he to do with music?’”

Ren and li, therefore, are to be understood as interconnected where li is instrumental to the practice of ren, and where ren simply cannot function without li as its guiding principle.

The Master said, ‘To return to the observance of the rites through overcoming the self constitutes benevolence. If for a single day a man could return to the observance of the rites through overcoming himself, then the whole Empire would consider benevolence to be his. However, the practice of benevolence depends on oneself alone, and not on others.’

The Master said, ‘Do not look unless it is in accordance with the rites; do not listen unless it is in accordance with the rites; do not speak unless it is in accordance with the rites; do not move unless it is in accordance with the rites.’

Confucius himself was an example of this, “The Master said, ‘I set my heart on the Way, base myself on virtue, lean upon benevolence for support”

---

52 17:12 D.C. Lau.
54 Chenyang Li, “Li as Cultural Grammar,” 323-324.
55 3:3, James Legge. “If a man be without ren, what has he to do with li; if a man be without ren, what has to do with music?”
56 12:1, D.C. Lau.
and take my recreation in the arts.” Moreover, the permanence of ren within a person is manifested in different ways among different situations, just as a tree’s roots may grow in different unique paths, and a sentence may be differently phrased or structured in grammar for each situation, so is li also relative, but ren unfettered, firm, and resolute.

Fan Ch’ih asked about benevolence. The Master said, ‘While at home hold yourself in a respectful attitude; when serving in an official capacity be reverent; when dealing with others do your best. These are qualities that cannot be put aside, even if you go and live among the barbarians.’

It is in and through li, that we find the concreteness and reality of ren, of which, “The Master said, ‘Love your fellow men.’” This love, however, as we have previously discussed, finds its moral balance with the virtue of yi, which gives li its form.

IV. 君子 Jun Zi

The sage is never sullied. That is why the call of the Master Kong is for the Man of ren to enter public office, and to ignore this call is to ignore one’s duty. So long as he has ren, even if he serves, in virtue of yi, he is not sullied. As “The Master said, ‘What the gentleman seeks, he seeks within himself; what the small man seeks, he seeks in others.’” Regardless thus of the external disorder present in society, the Jun Zi finds calmness and serenity within himself. Another passage, which supports this, is when: “The Master said, ‘The gentleman is at ease without being arrogant; the small man is arrogant without being at ease.’”

Indeed for Confucius, the solution to chaos and disorder is not outright refusal that is marked by the hermit’s or mystic’s withdrawal from society, but neither is it to succumb to it, but the courage to fight the system in spite of the system. Because “as for putting the Way into practice, he [Jun Zi] knows all along that it is hopeless,” yet even then, the Jun Zi stands above this impossibility, because no matter what circumstance, the purity of his

57 7:6, D.C. Lau.
60 18:7, D.C. Lau.
61 15:21, D.C. Lau.
character would remain untarnished. In fact, the following passage suggests that it is not Jun Zi who is influenced; rather, it is he who influences with his strength of will: “The Master wanted to settle amongst the Nine Barbarian Tribes of the east. Someone said, ‘But could you put up with their uncouth ways?’ The Master said, ‘Once a gentleman settles amongst them, what uncouthness will there be?’”64

But if the君子Jun Zi is a man of internal calmness and strength, unsullied and unfettered, why the need for refinement, why the need to show others if he is, in himself, secure of his internal character? A disciple of the Master asked this as well:

Chi Tzu-ch’eng said, ‘The important thing about the gentleman is the stuff he is made of. What does he need refinement for?’ Tzu-kung commented, ‘It is a pity that the gentleman should have spoken so about the gentleman. “A team of horses cannot catch up with one’s tongue.” The stuff is no different from refinement; refinement is no different from the stuff. The pelt of a tiger or a leopard, shorn of hair, is no different from that of a dog or a sheep.’65

Indeed, because whatever is inside, must necessarily show outside. The awareness of ren, must necessarily be followed by its expression in li, with yi as its form.

Jun Zi thus is a man of ren,66 of yi,67 perfected and refined, that is, precisely made a Jun Zi through the practice of li. All this is in him when he practices li to perfection because: “The Master said, ‘Virtue never stands alone. It is bound to have neighbours.’”68 Indeed, the primary Confucian virtues cannot each stand alone; all of them are connected and interdependent upon each other. Moreover, ‘The Master said, ‘The gentleman is no vessel.’”69 This is to say that the Jun Zi is no specialist, designed for a specific purpose. He is the embodiment of all virtues, and because all virtues come from Tian, therefore, it necessarily follows that Jun Zi is the embodiment of Tian. As Wing-tsit Chan notes: “The sage aspires to become Heaven, the worthy aspires to become a sage, and the gentleman aspires to become a worthy.”70

64 9:15, D.C. Lau.
65 12:8, D.C. Lau.
66 4:5, D.C. Lau.
68 4:25, D.C. Lau.
69 2:12, D.C. Lau.
This is also why in the last passage of the Lun yu: “Confucius said, ‘A man has no way of becoming a gentleman unless he understands Destiny; he has no way of taking his stand unless he understands the rites; he has no way of judging men unless he understands words.’” Man is, again, therefore, cultivated in li and by understanding li, gains the ability for the expression of 仁 ren and his firmness of character, towards the direction of 義 yi, the ideal of objective morality cemented by the existence of community.

It is, however, in the following verse in the Lun yu where li would stand as a very place where 君子 Jun Zi is cultivated despite li being a supplementary instrument to both 仁 ren and 義 yi: “Tzu-chang said, ‘One can, perhaps, be satisfied with a Gentleman who is ready to lay down his life in the face of danger, who does not forget what is right at the sight of gain, and who does not forget reverence during a sacrifice nor sorrow while in mourning.’”

If one is able to follow 義 through li, one is also able to uphold 仁, because he is also aware of his 義. This is most concretely mentioned in the Lun yu, where: “The Master said, ‘The gentleman widely versed in culture but brought back to essentials by the rites can, I suppose, be relied upon not to turn against what he stood for.’”

Epilogue

仁 ren is the root and most important virtue of Confucian philosophy, which precludes the moral system of the Master, but it is counterbalanced as well as complemented by 義. The interplay, however, of Love and Discipline, is perfected by the 君子 Jun Zi, a man of li, who in doing the proper rituals and social conduct, also shows his ability to empathize with and respect others, as well as his ability to fulfill his moral duty to society as a good citizen and member of the community. By carrying with it, necessarily all the other virtues, li becomes a locus for the cultivation of 君子, the perfection of man as a moral project, able to express 仁, able to understand and work towards 義.

The Graduate School, University of Santo Tomas, Philippines

---

71 20:3, D.C. Lau.
72 19:1, D.C. Lau.
73 6:27, D.C. Lau.
References

